

1990 Welcome in Sentences

I don't think we need a president

We have two representative bodies to make laws and decisions

In conflict, or if of great import, these laws or decisions could be put to vote by the people, called instantly to the polls

These bodies could choose from among themselves a good speaking person to travel abroad, a different one each time, to meet representatives of other nations

These bodies could choose a good looking person in the same manner for TV press conferences and a person with a pleasing voice for radio

All speeches could be written by poets

These bodies could also choose a good sportsperson to take vacations, which would have media coverage, to show that everyone in a capitalistic society gets some time off from work, if this person has a job

All questions of war or invasion could be voted upon by the people, but only those who are mothers

All ecological issues which relate to the future could be voted upon by the people, but only those under 18

All tents could be free