Social Sciences Building, Room 107

Dr. Tria Blu Wakpa
Wednesday, February 7, 2018
3-5PM
Social Sciences Building, Room 107

Because Indigenous peoples' very presence undermines U.S. authority, settler colonial discourses have sought to invisibilize Native peoples and nations through physical and cultural genocide and misrepresentation. Unearthing the relationship of Indigenous cultural productions to Native sovereignties therefore becomes an important political project. This talk critically examines the vital and, at times, uneasy linkages between Indigenous human and nonhuman persons' sovereignties through the lens of North American hand talk (sign language), dances, martial arts, and their convergences.

Come out to a talk featuring Dr. Tria Blu Wakpa, who will talk about how settler colonial discourses have sought to invisibilize Native peoples and nations through physical and cultural genocide and misrepresentation. This talk critically examines the vital and, at times, uneasy linkages between Indigenous human and nonhuman persons' sovereignties through the lens of North American hand talk (sign language), dances, martial arts, and their convergences.

This Blu Wakpa received her Ph.D. in Ethnic Studies from UC Berkeley, and M.F.A. in Creative Writing from San Diego State University, and is currently a UC President's Pioneers of Progress in Residence at UC Riverside. Her book project, Hand Talk: American Indian Sovereignty, Kinship, and Sharing in Educational and Cultural Contexts, examines the complex and intersections among Native oral traditions, human-animal, and performance.

EQUITY-MINDED LEADER

Undergraduate Students Through Peer Teaching

We invite you to join us in undergraduate student peer teaching to discuss the history of equity, diversity, and inclusion on campus. There is a great opportunity for you to get involved and make your voice heard. Check the dates for the calendar of events on Canvas and U2U to attend. You can also attend our events during the study of equity, diversity and inclusion in the fall. We encourage our teaching assistants, current and incoming students, staff, and faculty.
