

UCSD Diversity
By Xinyue Zhang

It is a normal day in the UCSD campus, everyone wake up and go to classes. However, when these students wake up, White Americans students are shocked by their faces because their skin colors turn to yellow while the skin color of those Asian Americans become white. With their new skin colors, those students go to their classes just like usual. This is the day when Math 20Z class gives these students their midterms back, everyone in the class are nervous and anxious when they are waiting for their scores. When they finally get their tests back, some White Americans with yellow skin get a B, and they are happy about their grades. At that moment, another student come to them and ask, "What's wrong with you? Why are you satisfied with your grades? You are supposed to get an A, don't you?" These students are confused and puzzled by her question, but later they just realize that they have Asian skin colors right now, and they now understand how Asian Americans feel when they were asked this type of question. In the other part of the class, those Asian Americans are asked by other students to attend an event, but they refuse because they want to spend more time studying. Other students give them a weird look and say, " Don't be socially dead." At that moment, these Asian American realize that the reason they are sometimes excluded from the big community is that they don't really attend these social events, so they lose the opportunity to interact with other students. After one day, all of them get their original skins back; it is a new day again, and everyone start to change their views of each other.
